

Comparison between developmental anthropology in rural and urban areas

Rural development can be defined as follows: Rural development is a comprehensive, composite and continuous process that embraces all the structural transformations defined by the rural world. This series translates through the development of the level of results of agricultural activity, exploitation of natural and human resources, Is working to increase the attractiveness of life and work in the countryside, whether at the local, national or international level.

Urban anthropology is a subset of anthropology concerned with issues of urbanization, poverty, urban space, social relations, and neoliberalism. The field has become consolidated in the 1960s and 1970s.

Goals of the study of developmental anthropology

Goal 1:

Students will learn to see human cultures , religious rituals, political or economic behavior from an anthropological perspective. These insights can be applied both to cultures separated from students' own cultures by time or space as well as their own cultures.

Goal 2:

Students will learn that anthropology as a discipline has a strong commitment to issues of social justice.

Lecture.7

T. Yasmin Osam

Goal 3:

Students will understand the process of anthropological interpretation and representation.